Word Alive this evening

We read that in the early church, they sold their possessions and pooled them so no one was in need. It was an early example of living in a commune. And Jesus told the rich, young ruler to sell all he had if he wanted to follow Him. Do you have a suspicion that the command wasn't just for him?

How much should Christians hold on to possessions and money? How can a Christian justify having anything more than basic possessions while there are people in great need? Then again, is it really practical to have to keep giving up anything you have and most of your income? Not a great incentive in evangelism, surely?

This is not an easy aspect of faith to consider as it threatens to challenge us all and potentially load us with guilt unless we are just above the poverty line. But face it we will, and attempt to face the full challenge of Jesus. This should stretch our thinking on faith!

David
